

My hero is not famous. She hasn't stepped on the red carpet, or been chased by professional photographers. However, she is still my hero. She is Ms. Johnson, my fourth grade teacher. You might be wondering why I picked her as my hero; after all, I did have a lot of teachers in the past. She was a brand new teacher at my school. She came to school smiling and truly ready to teach us. I felt happy to learn because of that. I remember that she told us that our class was one big family, and we should treat each other nicely. Also, while we were working, she would tell us over and over again, that it was important that we worked hard. She taught us how to respect her and other students...as well as other adults in the school. Sometimes, my classmates and I would give her a hard time. She was still very patient and kind to us. I could tell that all she wanted was for us to succeed and have a bright future. She fixed problems, taught us well, inspired me, and played a great role of how I became who I am today. Now that I'm a fifth grader, everything that she has taught us has definitely applied to my everyday life. I do my homework every day and turn in my assignments on time. She has made a big impact on what I do. That's why Ms. Johnson will forever be my hero.
